A new method for in vivo measurement of blood flow in peripheral skeletal muscles. In the present study we present and evaluate an innovative method for measuring local blood flow in skeletal muscles. The method is based on the perfusion-diffusion theory. It utilizes local muscle swelling to increase capillary permeability, to modify the blood-tissue concentration difference of a polar tracer, and to cause a tracer loss from the tissue via diffusion. The measured tracer exchange, expressed as the tracer content in the capillaries/tissue ratio, is presumed to represent the perfusion rate, and therefore the local blood flow. This is an estimate of the capillary blood flow, one component of which, the fast and slow blood flow, is derived from the hemoglobin concentration gradient. The method has been applied to study skeletal muscle perfusion in vivo in the freely moving rat. In the thigh muscle of a catheterized animal, swelling was caused by local injection of a polymer, which was removed after a short observation period and the tracer content was measured. In the rat muscle, swelling was achieved by local treatment with a hypertonic solution. After 1 h of swelling the blood flow was found to increase by about 50%. In the thigh muscle of the catheterized rat, a post-local treatment with 5-hydroxytryptamine resulted in an eight-fold increase in blood flow after 1 h. This increase in blood flow was accompanied by a two-fold rise in the content of the tracer in the muscle (capillaries/tissue ratio). The proposed method represents a novel approach to study local blood flow in skeletal muscles in vivo.Q: Simplifying Gradient in python
