The Green Party has written to Fianna Fáil leader Micheál Martin urging him to drop his amendment to the Equal Status Bill which provides for a referendum on gay marriage. The Green Party says that one of its members, Barry McCrudden, has been sacked from the party for speaking out on the subject of gay marriage. Fianna Fáil has tabled an amendment to the Equal Status Bill which would require a referendum to be held on any move to legalise gay marriage. The Green Party believes this amendment contradicts Mr Martin's stated intention to hold a referendum. In his letter to Mr Martin, Green Party Senator David Norris said the party opposes gay marriage but considers the legislation as it stands, including the amendment to legalise gay marriage, to be a matter for the people. Senator Norris points out that the party is the only one of the three main parties to have supported equal marriage legislation in recent years.

"This legislation has already been passed through a number of parliamentary stages, including consideration in the Dáil and the Seanad. The subject was also raised in the Citizens' Assembly, which the Green Party was part of. "A referendum on the legislation is expected to take place in the coming months. The party is advocating this as the route by which the people should make this decision." Senator Norris says that Mr Martin's amendment, which if adopted will require the referendum on the subject, will interfere with the party's right to campaign on the issue. "In the course of this debate, we have on many occasions raised concerns about the manner in which the amendment is being considered. There have also been some misrepresentations about the content of our position. "I urge you and your party colleagues to work with us to ensure that a referendum on this important issue can take place in accordance with the wishes of the Irish people."

Mr McCrudden is the first member of the party to be dismissed since the election of members
