This review addresses the contribution of proteases inhibitors to the multiple steps of malignant tumor growth and metastasis. Special emphasis is put on cancer cells and their proteolytic activity. Extracellular matrix and proteolytic enzymes are also discussed, since their degradation by secreted proteases may modify tumor cell behavior. The extensive and controlled degradation of extracellular matrix is necessary for the invasion of cancer cells into the surrounding tissues, and may also play a role in tumor angiogenesis and metastatic dissemination. Both type I (serine) and type II (aspartyl) proteinase inhibitors have been found to be associated with the tumor mass. Little is known about their role in tumor progression and metastasis, and experimental data are scarce. Several hypotheses to explain the molecular basis of their inhibitory activity are discussed. A possible role of protease inhibitors in the interaction of tumor cells with stromal cells is also considered. Central effects of sodium and calcium currents on the local application of glutamate to cerebral cortex in vitro. We applied glutamate, with and without glutamate transport inhibitors, to small islands of cortex in a multichambered in vitro preparation of fetal rabbit brain. Glutamate and aspartate selectively depolarized the cells in the lower layer of the islands. N-methyl-D-aspartate receptor blockers had no effect on the cell voltage or on their response to glutamate. Transjunctional current (J<sub>Glu</sub>) evoked by glutamate was blocked by nifedipine, verapamil, or cadmium, and was reduced by nimodipine. A calcium-depleted medium containing glutamate or polylysine increased the amplitude of the inward sodium current (I<sub>Glu</sub>), and induced more cell depolar
