Myocardial contraction defects can influence the electrical activity of the heart, particularly its T wave, and so can contribute to the development of arrhythmias. The purpose of this study was to develop a new method for assessment of myocardial contraction and its influence on the T wave in patients with Long QT Syndrome (LQTS) and compare it to standard methods of T wave assessment. We recorded ECG signals of the heart, body surface, and ECG leads in the thorax of 6 LQTS patients and 4 healthy volunteers. To determine the influence of myocardial contraction, we compared the T waves of the heart with those on the body surface and made ECG signal shifts (ECG subtraction). In healthy volunteers, the T wave was significantly negative on the body surface and had a more positive QT-negative shift on the heart than on the body surface. In LQTS patients, the T waves were significantly positive on the body surface and had a significantly more negative QT-positive shift on the heart than on the body surface. The magnitude of the differences between the different recording methods were greatest in LQTS-1, the patient with the shortest corrected QT interval. The T waves of the heart and body surface in patients with LQTS show markedly different patterns. These differences are related to different influences of myocardial contraction. When a pure QT-
