A dump file is a special file which is created when an exception is being caught in a debugger. The dump file contains all of the information that is stored by the debugger as it reaches the exception, including all of the information about the process, the operating system, the hardware, and all of the data that is currently being processed by the debugger. When an exception is caught in a debugger, the operating system creates a dump file with the contents of the program stack, memory, registers, and all global and stack variables that are currently being used by the debugger. A dump file is created just for the current execution. Dump Files. Dump Files. An alternative to the compact executable. A Dump file can be of two types: a Unix Dump or a Windows Dump. The main difference between the two is that a Unix Dump is created in the file system of the host running the debugger and a Windows Dump is created in the file system of the debugger.
