Kadvi Hawa Movie Category:2010s Hindi-language films Category:2017 films Category:Indian films Growing up in Scotland I was born in Scotland. I was born in Glasgow. I was born in a big, old, Victorian house, and I was born at night. My mother came home from the hospital later that night, in a cab. A cab. The night before I was born, it rained, it poured, but somehow my mother managed to cope with a baby in the rain, while holding onto her umbrella, and get her taxi and drive home. Not an easy feat. An hour later she had me. And she gave birth in a hospital. So I was born into a world of hospitals and nurses and being constantly ill. My parents had to buy me a huge shopping bag of play-dough for an excuse to leave me alone for a while. And even as a baby, I was obsessed with art. I thought it was what life was all about. I thought I was an artist. I thought I could create and create and create until my mother would come to take me out of the house, which would inevitably happen. But I had a short career as an artist before I realised I was a writer, as life was kind to me. I left the hospital with a childhood illness, and never looked back. While growing up, I was always sketching. I had a huge collection of pencils. I had a passion for sketching in pencil and in pen, ink, chalk and anything else that was useful. I was always drawing, always sketching. I drew even while I was eating, while I was playing, or sitting on the floor playing with my friends. In fact, I could only draw in a space completely free of distractions, and I drew most of all when I was with my friends, when we were playing together. I read every book I could get my hands on. We had to buy all our books at a local shop – it was called ‘Aldo’s Books’ – and I bought all of the children’s books, every single book. I read all the books I could get my hands on, and I read them over and over and over again. I was really into reading, and writing, and getting to know the world. I read newspapers. I read
