In retelling the stories of these lives, and the lives of many others like them, the author explores the contradictions of a city where nothing is quite what it seems. The first in a series of interlinked novels, Our Kind of Traitor traces the lives of Michael Arjun Mukherjee, an ambitious young software engineer, and Kunal Mukherjee, a doctor who is a lifelong political activist, in the city of Kolkata, in the late 1990s. Arjun, a Bengali Hindu, is the son of a wealthy American businessman in California; Kunal, a Bengali Muslim, is the son of a famed activist, a community leader who was gunned down by the police. Lallan, an English-educated lawyer, is also in the city, working for a private international law firm. The four men become friends and frequent each other's homes; they team up to start an internet company. Their different lives lead them to different places. Lallan is enjoying the freedoms of the professional class in an India that is in the middle of a remarkable economic boom. He is employed at the firm of Mutter, Payne and Hay, one of the largest and most prominent law firms in the country, where he is able to carve out a niche for himself as a civil liberties lawyer. The firm has taken on a large number of pro-democracy litigation cases, and its success gives Lallan some influence in the city's politics. Lallan's tastes are refined, his manner is elegant, and he is obsessed with culture. He keeps in touch with artists, musicians and writers in the West, and enjoys the musical and literary festivals that are common to the city. At home he tries to teach his children about the British Raj and the cultural glories of Calcutta. Kunal is a loyal member of the ruling Communist Party of India (Marxist) in the city, and he accepts its basic ideology without question. He is the son of a brilliant Bengali Muslim activist and historian and has grown up in the company of political activists in the city, and sees himself as an advocate for the common man. He is a doctor, and he attends to the poor, treating them free of charge, and is proud of his work. He and Arjun are colleagues at the same hospital. Arjun's father is, at best, ambivalent about India. He lives in California, and is very close to his family in the United States. He has been there
