Non-iron foundry core materials are widely used, for example, in sand casting, because of their low cost and ease of handling. Water reducible core materials are widely used, especially for cores for the molding of large castings or castings with thick wall sections. When cores are used to mold large castings or for castings with thick wall sections, the wall thicknesses of the castings are generally about 1.0 mm or greater than 1.0 mm. To provide strength, the metal to form the cores must have a relatively high strength to weight ratio. The principal components of a water reducible non-iron foundry core are silica sand and binder (resin). The silica sand is composed of, for example, low, medium and/or high range silica sand. The binder is provided to hold the grains of sand together. The binder used to form a core may contain, for example, organic polymers. The binder serves to control the flow and keep the silica grains of sand together in the core. Organic binders may be either water reducible or non-water reducible. Water reducible binders are generally based on polymers containing epoxy functionalities that may be cured by the addition of an acid or base catalyst. In general, the water reducible binder is applied to the sand by flowing the sand through a binder box equipped with a dispensing mechanism. The silica sand is wetted by a solution or dispersion of the binder resin in water. In the binder box, the solution or dispersion of binder is sprayed onto the sand or the sand is tumbled in contact with the solution or dispersion to obtain a wet core. The wet sand 3da54e8ca3
