Flow CSV Editor Activation

Generates FlowFiles based on CSV files and saves them on the Azure blob storage. Flow Files Flow files are a type of flow step used to store the results of transformations, such as compressing a video file. In Flow, a flow file is a container for information that is used to generate the next file in the flow. You can also generate FlowFiles by using other data sources. Components of a Flow File The properties of a FlowFile follow a fairly standard XML format, although there are no constraints on the order or the number of properties used. The XML format of the properties of a FlowFile is as follows: %uri_attributes;#text #text #text #datetime #int In most cases, the value of a property is determined by its position within the file and the position within the stream. For example, the text in the above example would be interpreted as: <property name="System.Title" type="string">#text <property name="System.Description" type="string">#text The stream:stream element is used to declare the formatting of the content. For example, in the above example, the element is used to create a "block" 77a5ca646e
