When Information Collides There is a classic joke, as told by both Charlie Chaplin and Gene Kelly about Bob Hope (former Detroit Lions wide receiver - eventual star of the Monty Python Flying Circus, in case you didn't get the reference) about two guys in the old "San Diego Chicken" routine. One of them chases an airplane without a pilot, and Charlie says, "Buddy, you're chasing a $30 airplane without a $30 pilot." Hope had some sort of a mediocre football career with the Lions. Maybe he couldn't stay healthy, maybe he wasn't the best natural receiver in the league, or maybe he just didn't have a lot of natural athletic ability. He played receiver in the NFL for 12 years. At the time he joined the Lions, they had a terrible passing game. It was built on a very good running game, with explosive playmakers on the inside and a dangerous young passer named Brian Griese. Detroit set the NFL record for passing touchdowns in a season that year, with 36. Griese was a defensive player of the year, and a Pro Bowl performer, but his longest tenure with a pro team was two years with the Lions, and he ended up leaving Detroit to become a starting quarterback for the Denver Broncos. He proceeded to lead Denver to the playoffs in his second year, and perhaps have been a star in the NFL with a few less injuries, but he's been a pretty good quarterback for more than a decade. I guess the joke is, when two guys that can pass accomplish a common feat, one of them should go home instead of winning. This occurs regularly in the information industry. It's just like in the joke. Information, in the way it is now designed, is a $30 airplane without a $30 pilot. The Big Four are increasingly seen as the Linux of the information technology industry. From their perspective, they are in the same position that the San Diego Chicken was chasing the airplane
