* A digital photo is an image that contains an electronic representation of a scene, captured using a digital camera or by scanning an image taken on film. Digital images often have a resolution of between 300 and 6000 pixels on each side. A 24-megapixel image is the largest format that can be successfully opened in Photoshop, although larger files can be opened as JPEG2000 images. * A Photoshop file is a multipage document containing all the layers necessary to create an image. A background layer and a selected layer are needed to create your final image, as in the following `.psd` file: background Layer 1 Layer 2 * A layer is a set of instructions that you can apply to create your image. It consists of a fill and a line color, as in Figure 16-1. * If you apply a layer's instructions to the image, you're essentially telling Photoshop that you want to apply the instructions that are on the layer to the top of the image. To create a new layer, select Layer ⇒ New Layer. * An adjustment layer is a layer that affects the adjustment applied to the current layer. There are multiple different adjustment layers available, including Levels, Curves, and a few others. They enable you to control the look of the entire image using a single adjustment layer. Adjustment layers can be applied to all or part of an image. Figure 16-1: A new layer allows you to place instructions on a blank background.

Q: Homography calculating between point planes I have already calculated the homography matrix between those two point planes and saved it in the object's axis. But I want to draw the image in point plane instead of in straight lines. What I have to do? EDIT: Here is the homography matrix between two point planes: A: If you're really interested in using a homography for some particular purpose, and can be convinced to be a bit more explicit about what you want to accomplish, there are some really cool and relevant resources available. Cormack and Shild's paper on the best user-defined function for affine plane correspondence is a great starting point. Zhou and Mohan's paper on remap cues from unstructured photos is a good one, as it references earlier papers. If you have a set of point correspondences, you can compute the 2D transform, and then you can use pixel warping to compute a transform that warps your source image to your destination. These also lead to some really cool images, which show where the warped points would lie relative to the edges of the image.
