And yet, the scenario of a non-nuclear strike by the US on Russia is so easy to forget. Yes, the B-52s are already capable of hitting military targets anywhere in Russia and it is easy to forget that a single B-52 can carry up to 72,000 pounds of conventional or nuclear warheads. The B-52s have remained the heavy bombers of choice for the Air Force for some 40 years now. They are capable of flying great distances and are seen as the lynchpin of deep-strike options by the US. Each bomber can fly a variety of missions, from stealth strikes to disarming the enemy of chemical and biological weapons and to provide close air support for friendly ground forces. The B-52s have been considered highly reliable throughout their 40-year long service life. However, it can be done far more cheaply, far faster and with far less risk of casualties than a nuclear strike. As part of a non-nuclear strike the US could deploy B-1 and B-2 bombers to deliver conventional weapons, cruise missiles or even heavy and light bombers. B-1s and B-2s carry a range of long-range weapons including the JDAM anti-radar weapon, to overwhelm adversary radars and anti-aircraft defenses, and the MGM-140 ATACMS air-to-surface missile to knock out hardened enemy air defenses. These kinds of non-nuclear strikes have been in use for years. While the US would want to deny Russian claims of a non-nuclear strike the reality is, the US could not reasonably expect that Russia would believe any claim of its side to be a lie. The B-2s and B-1s are classified and there
