SHANGHAI (Reuters) - China's first private cargo jet took off in late October, making its first flight test since it started operations more than a year ago, according to China Aviation Supplies Holding, which owns the plane. The 767-200 wide-body twin jet, the ARJ-21, flew a six-hour test flight on Oct. 24 from Shanghai to Beijing, and landed back at the airport in the eastern Chinese city. "It did not include any mission. The purpose of the flight was to test aircraft systems," a spokesman for the jet's developer, AVIC-Aircraft Industry Corp, said on Saturday. "The jet can fly a variety of routes and it will be introduced to the public after it is complete with its engines," the spokesman said in an email, adding that the total cost was about 3 billion yuan ($463 million). The ARJ-21 is part of the ARJ-21 program which aims to launch a total of 110 planes by 2020. China launched the ARJ-21 development program in 2010, and the first ARJ-21 prototype made its first flight on July 3, 2012, with the first production model due to fly in 2016. The jet, which has a maximum takeoff weight of more than 250 tonnes, seats 88 passengers in a 2,500-3,500 nautical mile range.

It does not have any accessories at all, though, and is sold as barebones (or without keyboard) only. A: No. The boards are sold as barebones or with keyboard. They are only available with a keyboard. The boards are the same price, regardless of the keyboard or the other accessories. There are three models of NUCs. These are based on the motherboard, rather than the number of PCI-E slots, with the numbers matching their market share. Entry level: $129 barebones with keyboard Mid-level: $
